AN ACT

GRANTING A MATERNITY BENEFIT TO WOMEN WORKERS IN THE INFORMAL ECONOMY, AMENDING FOR THIS PURPOSE REPUBLIC ACT NO. 11210, APPROPRIATING FUNDS THEREFOR, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

EXPLANATORY NOTE

One of the drivers of Republic Act No. 11210 or the Expanded Maternity Leave Law is to increase the prevalence of breastfeeding among working mothers. The data is rich and clear that investing in national policies and programs to support breastfeeding – such as increased maternity benefits for working women – leads to marked improvements in social, health and economic development outcomes.

While the R.A. 11210 has been beneficial to working women, a large swathe of the work force, as well as their infants, remains unable to enjoy the provisions and benefits of the Expanded Maternity Leave Law. These are women working in the informal economy who are non-members of the Social Security System (SSS).

Peer-reviewed research has quantified the economic toll that inadequate breastfeeding takes on individuals, communities and countries, and has found that the current cost to the Philippine health care system due to inadequate breastfeeding is around US$16.3 million per year, and future cognitive losses of US$2.3 billion a year owing to reduced development and earning potential can be expected. The costs of infant formula also significantly reduce a family's disposable income. Providing a maternity benefit to women workers in the informal economy equivalent to around US$174 per mother is paltry compared to the potential economic benefits of improving breastfeeding rates at population level. In fact, according to the same study, the estimated cost of a 14-week maternity leave is only 5% of the cost of not breastfeeding in the Philippines¹.

Therefore, a maternity benefit for women workers in the informal economy is not just a social justice measure and an important way to address the multiple burdens and increased vulnerabilities of women who are also mothers and informal workers, it also leads to demonstrable and quantifiable health outcomes at the population level.

For these reasons, the immediate passage of this measure is earnestly sought.
